George Washington did not age well. He was pock-marked and lost all but one of his teeth, along with bone in his jaw, before his first inauguration at 57. But there was a time when he was quite a looker, apparently. One Mount Vernon representative noted in The Washington Post that we should think of him as an “action hero” rather than the sleepy-eyed patriarch we recognize on our dollar bills. Pitt professor of anthropology Jeffrey Schwartz is doing anatomical detective work to reimagine a youthful Washington in three dimensions. No sculptures of the man exist from those days. Forensic scientists may be used to the challenge of constructing aging composites of people, but it is unusual to de-age someone, notes Schwartz. The anthropologist is working with 3-D computer simulation experts to provide the Mount Vernon estate with reconstructions of Washington at ages 19, 45, and 57 that will be on display there later this year. Here is the father of our country reimagined at 19.
