James Antaki, who seems to specialize in Gee Whiz (see p. 17), shared this image with us. It’s a mesh used to create a model of two blood cells. At each intersection, a supercomputer solves a set of equations. Antaki and colleagues will use this process to simulate the paths of tens of thousands of blood cells.